Students, faculty, and staff at the University of South Carolina face gaps in campus safety communications during emergencies. Current issues include delayed or unclear emergency alerts, frequent false alarms that reduce trust in notifications, and a lack of targeted messaging (e.g., alerts that are not localized to affected buildings or populations). These problems reduce the effectiveness of emergency response, increase perceived risk, and can cause confusion or unsafe behavior during critical incidents.